What IS IT ?

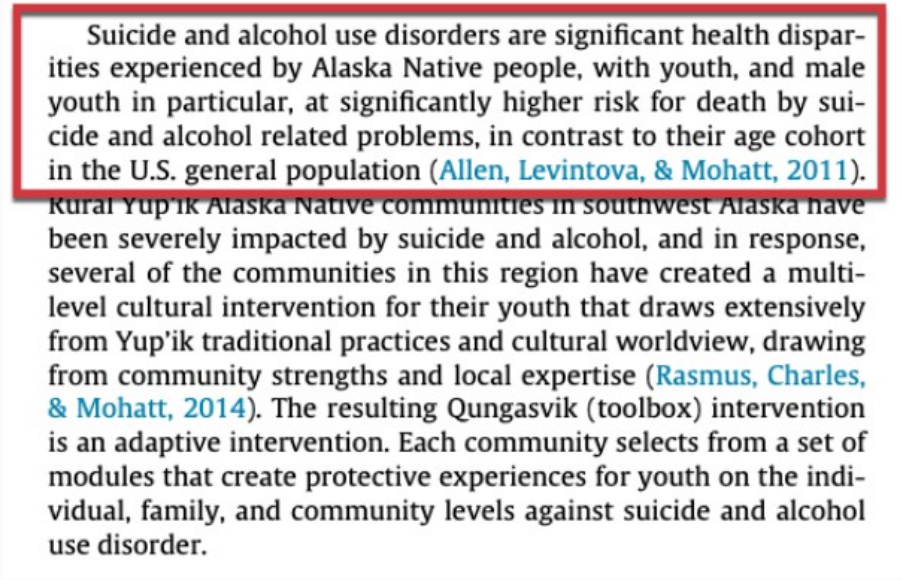

- Citing or documenting information sources is an important part of the research process.
- Once your research paper is complete you may need to create a Bibliography or List of Works Cited.

What IS IT ?

- To cite a source means to give credit for the original source of information, an idea, or way of articulating an idea.
- It is a standardized method of acknowledging resources used in your research.

Below is an example of an in-text citation and it's associated bibliography at the end of the article.

- In the screenshot, the authors Allen, Levintova, & Mohatt are given credit for the meaning behind the sentence outlined in red.

Suicide and alcohol use disorders are significant health disparities experienced by Alaska Native people, with youth, and male youth in particular, at significantly higher risk for death by suicide and alcohol related problems, in contrast to their age cohort in the U.S. general population (Allen, Levintova, & Mohatt, 2011). Rural Yup'ik Alaska Native communities in southwest Alaska have been severely impacted by suicide and alcohol, and in response, several of the communities in this region have created a multilevel cultural intervention for their youth that draws extensively from Yup'ik traditional practices and cultural worldview, drawing from community strengths and local expertise (Rasmus, Charles, & Mohatt, 2014). The resulting Qungasvik (toolbox) intervention is an adaptive intervention. Each community selects from a set of modules that create protective experiences for youth on the individual, family, and community levels against suicide and alcohol use disorder.

- At the end of the paper is a bibliography, where you can see the complete citation for the 2011 Allen, Levintova, & Mohatt article.

WHY IS IT NEEDed ?

Scholarly discourse

Scholars cite their sources and provide lists of the sources to give credit to the work of other researchers, and so that colleagues and others can locate the source.

Document your research

Instructors are interested in knowing which ideas stem from the student and which ideas are built upon those of other writers. Citing sources gives your instructor a sense of how much work you've done on a paper

Ethics

If you don't cite your sources, you are not giving credit for the work of others. This is called plagiarism and is considered a serious offense by all universities.

HOW TO DO IT ?

different ways to cite sources using different citation styles.

- Several standards have been created by different academic fields and publishers for documenting sources;
- MLA, APA, Chicago.
- Check with your instructor if you are unsure which citation style is appropriate for your research paper.
